Dear Orville:

When I was downtown at the library researching my Law of the Sea book, I had a chance to look up the article in Life Magazine about you. My goodness, to be mentioned in the same breath with French architect LeCorbusier and utopian Sir Thomas More, is quite a compliment to your vision.

I was only able to download a few pages from your www.victorycities.com website, so I don't know all the ramifications, but your table of contents shows how many details you have already thought of.

Your search for investors doesn't reveal what their motivation would be to provide the money for your dream, so I don't know what that is.

I don't know either whether you have interviewed a great many average citizens about how they feel about the lack of individual control they would have over their lives in exchange for all the good things you would attempt to provide different from the problems of the cities we live in today.

Anyway, I think you, personally, have an admirable motivation in trying to provide us with a better life in the future even if it is extremely hard to accomplish.

Best wishes, and enjoyed talking to you at lunch with my sister, Vera Schrage this week.-

Kirk
