>comments: I myself am a student of urban planning and I find I am very interested in your ideas. However I am concerned that what you propose is unrealistic considering the importance of our present urban centres in terms of history, economic function and the importance of economic location. These issues coupled with the problem of persuading people to live in a completely different environment where theoretically they can be controlled and observed at whim by the authorities seems to me to be a major drawback to your scheme. Can you perhaps address these issues ?
