

Finally, let me put this in a different context. It's easy to point to war as the most devastating culprit ever to beset the human race, and even to charge religious differences with responsibility for many of those wars, but here again; It isn't necessarily the upfront battles that merit all the attention, it's the residual impact that really matters. Which of the major wars that this nation has been engaged in over the years should not have been fought or could not be justified in your judgment of the residual effect? Isn't it wonderful to live in a country where even a minority is permitted the luxury of dreaming about things like Victory City, but where the majority makes sure that realism prevails?
